3-8-11

It is my belief that to work in a consumers home any and all technicians should be required to hold a public service technicians license. Having a public service technicians license ensures consumers that the technician working in their home is registered with the State of Connecticut and is held to the standards that the Electrical Work Board sets forth. To not hold contractors to the same standards would be a disservice to Connecticut consumers. I believe that the government has a responsibility to consumers to ensure that all technicians who enter their home, regardless if they are an employee or contracted labor, are held to the standards that are required by the PST license. Without the license residents of Connecticut are risking having inexperienced and untrained technicians work in their homes which would put their safety at risk.

Thank you for your time,

James Barilla