For several years I have attended the hearings concerning potential legislation to legalize so-called same-sex "marriage." At the last hearings, proponents argued that civil unions would grant and afford homosexuals the privileges and rights they felt they were entitled to have as committed couples.

The ink had barely dried when the next move was made to usurp for themselves the verbiage, "marriage."

Since homosexuals now have all the same legal rights and privileges as heterosexuals, is this not simply an effort to legislate acceptance and affirmation of a life-style?

I ask, "What will homosexuals need next to feel affirmed?"

House Bill 7395 is unnecessary and counter-productive.
