To whom this may concern,

The animal rights club at NHS feels that this law to allow students to chose to dissect animals or not should be passed in order to sustain fairness among students. Students should have the rights to choose for what they believe in, and if this is not allowed then that's taking away the students opinion, and rights as an American.

I, myself, have been considering to take a course in anatomy, but the fact that I may be forced to dissect a living creature is altering my opinion. It's what our school does for religion: they dont bring it up because that would be unfair to the students and they give them the choice. Forcing students to dissect frogs is very similar to this because many people have different opinions on the matter and think disecting a frog is actually very wrong.

Now, some people may ask "why did the student take this course if they knew they would have to disect an animal?" This can be simply answered by the fact that students are interested in the topic, like me, and would very much like to learn about anatomy. There are many other alternative ways for students to learn about dissection such as DVDs, websites, books, and many more. Please consider everything I have talked about, and understand that this change is important not only to me, but every single person on Earth that believes in animal rights.

Sincerely,

Kim Reynolds
