Good afternoon, Senator Fonfara and Representative Widlitz, and members of the committee. My name is Liz Dupont-Diehl and I am the Policy Director for the Connecticut Association for Human Services. CAHS seeks to end poverty and empower all families to build a secure economic future. CAHS was a leading advocate in the battle to establish Connecticut's Earned Income Tax Credit, and we were joined by dozens of others individuals and organizations, many of whom have signed on in support of our testimony today.

We respectfully oppose any cuts to the EITC, no matter how small, on the grounds that it is an extremely effective anti-poverty program, incentive to work, and economic stimulant – all of which our state badly needs.

In its first year, Connecticut's EITC helped one in eight households, in every town in the state, returning an average of $600 to 180,000 families. All of these were working and their incomes averaged just below $18,000 per year.

Let's do the math and see what cutting the EITC means. A single parent earning $18,000 per year – that's about what a full-time, minimum wage worker makes at $8.25 per hour, year-round – has only $1,500 each month to pay for basics such as housing, food, clothes, transportation and medical expenses. This family runs a deficit, unable to pay basic bills, let alone build credit, buy a home or get ahead.

Yet despite such limited means, this family actually pays a larger percentage of its income in taxes than higher income families. A recent report by the Institute on Taxation and Economic Policy shows that families in Connecticut making less than $24,000 a year pay 11% of their income in state and local taxes, or more than $1 out of every $10 they earn, while households that make more than $1.2 million each year—the top 1 percent— pay just 5%, or $1 in $20.

A family of three living on $18,000 each year is already living in poverty and should not be paying a larger share of its income in taxes than higher income households.

CAHS reported last month that the number of working poor families in Connecticut – that is, earning 200% or less of poverty, or $45,622 for a family of four, and who can use the EITC– rose 5% since 2007. Now, 21% of our 389,000 working families are low-income. Our report also found that 61% of low-income families have a high housing burden- paying more than 33% of their income on rent – and that this rise in low-income working families is increasingly affecting children.

The EITC is perhaps the most studied, tested, debated and analyzed policy in our arsenal of tools to help families succeed and build a secure future for themselves, and a productive future workforce for us all. The results are overwhelmingly clear that it has a positive impact immediately on family health and the economy, and for years in almost every arena; health, education, earnings, etc. It works and it's perhaps the best investment we can make.

Connecticut is heading down a dangerous road in which 21% of working families don't earn enough to provide the basics. Our state deficit is driven in part by the large number of extremely poor people needing state health insurance and other benefits. Cutting the EITC pulls the rug out from under hardworking families who are already struggling against impossible odds.

Thank you for the opportunity to testify and I welcome any question.
