

I bought in house in Winsted in 06.

I decided to go to school, part time at NWCC. I excelled as a part time student.

I transferred to CCSU as a molecular Biology major. The economy collapsed and I had to stop going to school to protect my investment. After 3 years off, I returned to school to finished what I had started.

The proposed increase makes attaining my degree that much harder.

Little by little we are institutionalizing opportunity. Every time you cut from the state schools or raise tuition we make the dream of Higher education harder to achieve.

So I ask what is better, Me working a menial service job or working as a professional with great purchasing power and paying back into the economy for the next student?

It could be me working at the new Jackson labs, but I need to path available to get there.

900 dollars might not seem like a lot to many of you, but for me who is still recovering from the economic collapse, it just another hurdle to achieving that goal. In a state that continually speak about that value of an educated work force, that goal should affordable to all who are wiling to work for it.
