STATES WITH SPECIFIC DOMESTIC VIOLENCE CRIMES

By: Christopher Reinhart, Chief Attorney

You asked whether other states have specific domestic violence crimes. We understand this to mean crimes specifically targeted to people generally in a familial, household, or intimate relationship.

SUMMARY

Except for sexual assault in a spousal or cohabiting relationship (CGS § 53a-70b), Connecticut does not have specific crimes addressing domestic violence. Instead, conduct considered domestic violence is punished under generally applicable criminal statutes, such as the assault statutes, when the offender and victim have a familial, household, or intimate relationship.

We found 26 states with specific crimes that penalize domestic violence. Most states, such as Arkansas, define the elements of the domestic violence crime in each statute. Other states, such as Maine, define the domestic violence crime by requiring commission of a generally applicable crime (like assault) against certain victims (such as family or household members).

The domestic violence crimes in these 26 states cover a wide range of conduct and have a wide range of penalties. The penalties generally vary based on the conduct involved or an offender's prior convictions. In addition, some states have enhanced penalty statutes that penalize offenders with multiple domestic violence convictions. For example, Colorado's habitual domestic violence offender statute enhances penalties for someone with certain convictions that include underlying facts of domestic violence. We include these statutes in our report.

STATES WITH SPECIFIC DOMESTIC VIOLENCE CRIMINAL STATUTES

Table 1 displays the states, in alphabetical order, with specific domestic violence crimes, the name of each crime, and the conduct each punishes. We also include the basic criminal penalties for each statute. Other penalties may apply such as restitution, required counseling, and loss of firearms and the right to possess them.
