

Greetings,

Although the Legislature can pass a bill for whatever I feel the Governor, before he signs or vetoes it. There should be a formula which would be used to evaluate the necessity, cost effect, and timing. The treasury branch would use this guide and advise the Governor. I suspect this is what he does, but is there a set of rules he has to go by? As has happened, some time later the implementation of the Bill shows up as a larger burden on the Treasury than presented when it was debated in the Congress. The State already has a perfect example, Governor Grasso signed the building of the bridges and connectors in Farmington that were not connected for about 20 years. By then they had expensive repairs the tax payers had to pay for on top of the original bill.

Respectfully,

Richard Magnano Vernon, Ct. 06066
