

EVICTED TENANTS' PROPERTY

By: James Orlando, Senior Legislative Attorney

ISSUE

This report summarizes the law and recent bills on the responsibility of municipalities to store evicted tenants' property.

SUMMARY

PA 10-171 amended the responsibility of municipalities concerning the removal of personal property abandoned by evicted residential tenants. Previously, a state marshal who executes the eviction order was allowed to leave such possessions on the sidewalk or road to be picked up and stored by the municipality. The act eliminated a municipality's responsibility to pick up the abandoned property, instead requiring the marshal to deliver it to storage. By law, municipalities must keep the property in storage but may sell any unclaimed property.

Specifically, the state marshal must remove the evicted tenant's possessions and deliver them to a town-designated storage facility. If the person does not reclaim the possessions and pay the storage expenses within 15 days, the town may sell the items at a public auction after meeting certain notice and posting requirements. After deducting its storage costs, the town must give the evicted tenant the net proceeds of the sale, if any. After 30 days, if the evicted person does not claim the sale proceeds, the proceeds are deposited in the town treasury (CGS § 47a-42). These same procedures apply to possessions of a person evicted in a foreclosure or similar action (CGS § 49-22).

There have been several proposals to amend this law since 2011, including two fully drafted bills that were voted out of committee and eight proposed bills. Table 1 below summarizes these bills. Several of the proposals would have repealed the requirement that towns store evicted tenants' possessions; all such proposals died in committee.
