

My family has been victimized by family court in CT for two years now. I could spend a lot of time writing to you about the horrors of my case but I have come to understand that my case is not isolated, but instead all too familiar.

I have a corrupt GAL, who the Judge looks the other way with, a severely personality-disordered ex who has deep pockets and is bent on severing me from all ties with my kids, therapists/parental supervisors assigned to my case some of which have criminal backgrounds and other who are cross-affiliated with the AFCC who aides and abets child abuse, even in its most egregious form, pedophilia.

I have been before the trial court and before the appellate court. In both instances, it did not matter whether I was on the right side of the law. Real law only exists when there are officials upholding the laws which is a an anomaly in family court.

Changing law in my personal opinion would be wonderful, but not necessarily timely or effective with these courts.

I propose we put much more of our efforts into unorthodox solutions.

We need to expose, or threaten exposure through our presence, to those in judicial authority.

One possible solution is naming people involved in the judicial abuse-- GALS, therapists, supervisors, custody evaluators openly on the web. We need to flood the court house with an organized group of court watchers.

Would families that are victimized be better and more expediently served by letting people in the judicial system know, by our presence that we do not agree with what is going on?

If Judge saw that a parent had 20-30 people sitting on their side of the courtroom in support of them, they might be persuaded to conduct a more ethical hearing? A mass of people is more effective than a lone wolf.

Videotape, photograph or electronic record what is going on in the CT family court rooms.
