

As far as using the second amendment argument from creating better control to outright banning semi automatic assault rifles, one only has to do a realistic comparison between them and machine guns. Over time as technology advanced capabilities the assault rifle became more similar in capability to the machine gun. So considering why machine guns put into their own class of ownership control, why wouldn't follow to reason that the same reasons apply to these semi automatic assault rifles. It seems to me that Congress should have made this comparison years back and classified the two types of weapons under the same class. The leaders were either caught off guard or just playing ostrich.

If the semi automatic assault rifle isn't put into the class of machine guns then why should the machine gun continue being restricted. Taking a step even further out into our scary world, leaning on the spirit of capitalism, why not have hand grenades and their launchers become available. Wouldn't they become the real choice for home protection.

After all who can out gun a hand grenade.

We need to get a grip on our society and restore some value back into human life. No one needs the power of a semi automatic weapon in their hands. We need to restrict their ownership, along with tightening up those who are allowed to have guns in the first place. We look to our elective officials to make the right choice for the right reasons.

Enough with finger pointing, enough with placating to the lobbyist, return our streets to the people and schools to the kids. Do what is needed to be done.

Let's introduce some common sense.

Joe Tarshis
11 Phyllis Lane
Newtown, CT 06470